LETTER FROM LONDON.

[Correspondence of the Alexandria Gazette ] LONDON, Sept. 8 .- As I stated in my last letter I reached London about 20 minutes to 11 o'clock lest Saturday those abominable compartment cars on the London and Northwestern Railway. it was a special run for the benefit of the Umbrua's pasengers.

To my great disappointment, when I left the train and entered the hotel couducted by the railroad company, I found it was full and I had to seek other quarters. I was taken about a square away to a hostelry which had a fine ap nearance from without, but before I left, which I did the following evening, I found that it was conducted in many wave after the customs prevailing in the days of Oliver Cromwell. There was no gas in the rooms, and I was graciously allowed an inch and a balf of candle. There are many things concerning this interesting place I would like to describe, but this would expand his letter too much. I can only say I never found a more stupid set engaged in the hotel business. One man (an attache of the hotel) in uniform told me he never heard of Trafalgar Square or Lord Nelson's monument when I in-quired the distance to Charing Cross. He didn't know which portion of the h avens the sun rose in, and excused himself by saying people in cities paid little attention to such things. When I changed the subject and asked whose monument it was in front of us, cer-tainly not more than half a square away, he surveyed it for a few seconds as though it had never attracted his attention before, and finally replied that ne did not know, but thought it was some general. I approached it later and found it was to the memory of Rotert Stephenson.

It rained nearly all day Sunday, and I was compelled to remain where I was until about 5 o'clock, when, during a lull, I gathered up my trappings and left, determined to find Trafalgar Square myself. I boarded an omnibus equares away and finally landed there. I secured excellent accommodations in Morley's Hotel, on the corner of the square and the Strand. This, I think, is the most central spot in London. Charing Cross in in front of you, and Pall Mill is in the same neighborhood. Westminster Abbey and the Parliament Houses are within short walks, and Buckingham Palace, the London residence of the Queen, and Matlborough House, that of the Prince of Wales, are but short distances away. As may be supposed, I visited West-minster Abbey. I was there at half-past nine o'clock when the doors were opened, and went immediately to the Poet's Corner. There were not over a dozen people there at the time, and I mused in that interesting spot as long as I pleased. I stood upon the slabs marking the resting places of a numper of illustrious dead, among them those of Samuel Johnson and Charles Dickens. The royal tombs were not to be opened until an hour later. I did not wait, but visited the abbey the next afternoon and wound my way with the other visitors around the stacks of sarcophagi of kings, queens dukes, duchesses, archbishops and others. The receptables bore recumbent figures supposed to represent the de-ceased. The inscriptions are marly all in Latin, and, apart from proper names and dates, I could trans'ate but little of them. The first sarcopbagus I noticed was that of Segbert, who died in 616. It, of course, bears the marks of time. The tomb of Edward the First was next pointed out to me. Westminter Abbey is a place I had longed to see for many years, and I enjoyed my vis its greatly.

The Tower of London was the next place I invaded. I walked for nearly four hours that day, starting at Char ing Cross, passing from one end of the Strand to the other, into Fleet street, past St. Paul's Cathedral, the Royal Exchange and Bank of England until I turned into a street called the Minories which led to the Tower. I have walked over the same ground since, and each time have had my attention attracted by additional objects of interest. It was a gloomy day; a sort of fog seemed to hang over everything. I where the crown jewels and regalia are kept and looked at the display. The crowd was dense, and an attendant every ten seconds would sound the ad monition, "Look out for your pocket-books." I remained in the tower but a short time, but during that period much of the history connected with the place passed through my mind. I devoted nearly all that remained of the day in riding through the most populous streets of London perched on the top of an omnibus and enjoying fragrant cigars which a thoughtful and much esteemed friend in my far away home brought me before I left. In my road lay the British Museum, which I entered. This afforded a great feast. Statuary and fragments of statuary are there which were executed before the dawn of the Christian ers. I looked upon what are no doubt good representations of Julius Casar, Brutus and hosts of other noted characters in Roman history, as well as scores of equally noted Greeks. Being somewhat of an antiquary in taste, I stood beside the busts of many of whom I h d often read and mused ad libitum. The British Art Gallery and the Museum at West Kensington also afforded and stood for some time in front of Buckingham Palace. On my way thither I pessed Marlborough House, in which the Prince of Wales resides.

All transient advertisements must be paid for in advance. Of course I passed over London Bridge, and in doing so about the first loo bridges and went some distance out on B ackfriar's. In surveying S. Paul's Cathedral "Ralph Nickelby setting his watch by that clock was suggested. It seems strange what a hold fiction will take upon the human mind. With all the English history we may have stored away, when we view noted places the myths as well as the reality pass in panoranic view before the mind's eye. Were I to visit Damascus, and begin to realize that I was in the oldest city in the world, which existed before Abraham; the native place of Eleszer, his principal servant, wherein is situated "the street wich is called Straight," into which Saul of Tarsus was led bind and over whose walls he subsequently made his e-cape, I doubt not that I would involuntarily find myminutes to 11 o'clock lest Saturday self locating spots whereon some of the night, riding over 200 miles in one of thrilling scenes in the Arabian Nights Entertainments are said to have occur-

I shall probably send one more letter, in which I intend to give some of my own impressions concerning the British capital. I shall make no attempt to describe any noted building or place, as the guide books and encyclor edias have about exhausted those subjects. I shall only say in closing that, while London is a colossal city and full of interest, I regard the United States far ahead of England in most all things I have observed so far.
